

The Spag Dress Disaster

Lady Henrietta was heavily in debt. Her large staff, exotic holidays and the upkeep on Pemby Hall, the mansion which had been the family home for several generations, were all costing her serious money. In order to put the situation right, she had approached the Chinese Peng Corporation who were looking to invest several million pounds in suitable opportunities in the UK. Lady Henrietta's proposal, if successful, would create a golf course out of some spare farm land, clear her debts and give her a healthy income for the rest of her life.

But, what to wear for the presentation? After extensive and exhaustive—not to mention exhausting—research, she finally settled on a Spag dress, ordered online from Spag Face.

Putting the dress on just before going to meet the Chinese investors, she was a little surprised to find that the shoulder straps felt rather cold and clammy.

The Chinese investors had been treated to tour of the estate followed by a sumptuous meal in the large dining room at Pemby Hall. Everything was going swimmingly, and when Lady Henrietta rose from her seat at the head of the table to give her well-rehearsed pitch to the investors, she was confident of success. Barely three words into her speech, however, she felt both straps on her dress snap. The potential investors, horrified at her wardrobe malfunction, immediately upped and left. Her chances of rescue lay in tatters;

her estate would never be Peng.

On close examination of the dress, it turned out that the original straps had been replaced with dyed cooked spaghetti. Lady Henrietta was mortified and immediately began an investigation to find the culprit.

32 suspects were identified along with 5 clues. Each clue removes half the suspects. Can you use your SPaG skills to discover the culprit to ensure they get both a dressing down and the sack?
